The Central Conservatory of Music (CCOM), located on the site of former prince Chun's residence (in which Emperor Kuang-hsu was born) in the southwest corner of the once inner City of Beijing. It is the only national key institution of higher learning among all universities of arts in China directly under the supervision of Ministry of Education (originally under the Ministry of Culture) of the state council since 2000.

Though founded in 1950, the history of the CCOM can be dated over half a century ago for its forerunners, the Music Department of Yenching University which was organized back in 1927, the others being the Music Department of the Literature and Art School of the North Ching University (1939), the National Academy of Music (1940), the Music Department of the National Peiping School of Arts (1946), the Chung Hwa Academy of Music (Hong Kong and Shanghai 1946), and the Music Department of the Northwest Lu Hsun Institute of Literature and Art. Nevertheless the tradition and faculty of the National Academy of Music were mainly carried over by the CCOM. Moved from Tianjin to Beijing in 1958, it was classified as the key university of the country in 1960. Awarded as an advanced group by the Ministry of Culture in 1991, the CCOM was listed as one of the key universities in the "211 Project" (the national project of constructing 100 leading universities in China in the 21st century) in 2000. The former presidents have included Sicong Ma, Feng Zhao, Zuqiang Wu, Runyang Yu and Lin Liu. Professor Cizhao Wang is the current president.
